

Among the almost ubiquitous phenomena in modern culture is the presence of attempts to influence our thinking and beliefs. And, as publicist Edward Bernays found out in the early 1920s through his success in convincing American women that smoking cigarettes was an integral part of the women's liberation movement, influencing human thought processes is not all that difficult. Yet most humans remain unaware of the degree to which their desires and beliefs are determined by carefully designed campaigns to control their thoughts and behaviors. BRAINWASHED is a work designed to expose both the external processes and the underlying brain mechanisms which allow others to control our thinking. It reveals the psychophysiological substrate, the mechanics of learning theory, and the way ad campaigns - whether in the economic, political or religious sphere - use such factors as sex and fear and ego to channel our thinking into carefully-crafted channels.
