

She was seventy-two, according to her chart. Her face was an undulating field of deep wrinkles, much like the rows of squash and snap beans she had tended on the tiny farm in Waynesboro, Mississippi where she had lived with her husband, Ralph. Ralph worked over at the saw mill in Millry, about forty miles away. Each day at sunup Ralph cranked up the steel-blue, rust-covered Ford Model T for the hour-long drive to work, while Sadie got busy getting her four youngâ€™s ready for school, feeding the dozen or so chickens, and gathering eggs. Looking now into her milky cataract-laden eyes revealed little. There simply wasnâ€™t much behind those eyes. Ralph had seen to that. Her long, gnarled fingers revealed the story of a simple, hard-working woman. No secrets here. Sadie was tough; tough enough to rise each day and spend hours in the blistering Mississippi heat and suffocating humidity filling a burlap sack with pole beans, cucumbers, or any blessed thing that would grow in this God-forsaken field to keep food on the table for Ralph and the children. Her hands were so severely calloused there wasnâ€™t enough malleable epidermal tissue left for fingerprints. The knuckles looked like someone had lifted up her fingernails and shoved golf balls midway up each digit. You donâ€™t get hands like this sittinâ€™ on the front porch swing sippinâ€™ mint juleps. No siree; Sadie Phillips was a real woman, a warrior. Sadie was one tough cookie. She was ambulatory. Only she was one of the walking dead. War, race riots, integration, equal rights protests, and assassinations. To sophomore psychology student Gary Stanley, it seemed the whole world had gone crazy. That is, until he discovers Breezeland; a hidden refuge from the hostility and madness sweeping the nation. A bastion of peace and tranquility...but a place of dark secrets. Unfortunately, as Gary would soon learn, the insanity was only beginning. Based on real people, real stories. Real crazy.
