Business-Office Products Guide Human Resource Management is basically good leadership both administratively and inspiration-wise in keeping the troops happy. The main crux of it is the ability to hire good workers for the job and keep them. The HRMs objective, as stated by Schwind, Das & Wagar (2005), is: Human resource management aims to improve the productive contribution of individuals while simultaneously attempting to attain other societal and individual employee objectives. HRM people maximize the return on investment from the organizations human capital. HRM workers do the hiring, determining compensations, completing evaluations of performance, offering promotions, improving personal relations, training workers, introducing new technology and planning new organizational protocols. A good HR team or individual writes out exact job descriptions of what they're looking for, goes to the best places to look for suitable candidates (schools, newspaper advertising, internet websites, government employment agency, executive recruiters), picks the top candidates, interviews them, does reference and criminal background checks and from there, picks the people they want for the job. This is considered so important that the entire human resources profession was created out of it, this need to find good employees, treat them well, train them when and as required and eliminate the bad ones. Along with finding good employees, the other important functions are: Compensation, pay and benefits; retirement savings plan, pension, medical benefits, etc. Have a system of rules in place. Either have a company manual, an orientation video, walk-through or talk or all of the above. Managing employees through periodic personnel evaluation reports/ Pers. Training and development. Having a procedure to keep employees inspired and help them get ahead in the company. Problem Employee disciplinary procedures. Termination procedures. With the exception of the one man/ woman show, all businesses need some kind of staff. The best human resources managers are those who are fair and good to their workers. They tell workers clearly what is expected of them and tell them clearly what the rules are and who they answer to. In many jobs, these issues are left ambiguous until some manner of a situation happens. Do it all upfront to keep everybody crystal clear as to what's going on. One of the most critical factors of success in any business is to surround yourself with good workers. Write down a specific job description and clearly outline the requirements of the job. Eliminate all people who don't have the qualifications you want and interview the rest. The major qualifications are as follows: Education requirements. Years of experience on the job. Special requirements like ability to travel. You can find job candidates through newspaper advertising, college/ university/ school sources, employment agencies and networking with other staff or business associates. If somebody seems enthusiastic, take them on for a probationary period. Within any reasonably large corporation, there is an office or department that manages the administrative needs of the workers.
