By its eighth article this law directs that children up to 12 years of age shall attend a school, and in Article 9 it provides that young persons up to the age of 15 years (completed) shall only work 0 hours a day, unless they produce a certificate of primary instruction. The 15 regional inspectors are quite unable to insure the observance of these regulations, unless assisted by the special inspectors or by the local committees for which the law provides. These committees and inspectors, whilst very active iu Paris, are either wanting or inefficient in many of the departments.1 No certittcats d5tudes were delivered in 1879-80iu the Loire-Inferieurc, where so many of the children and young persons are employed in factories; the cause being stated to be a refusal on the part of the general council of the department to allow the examination to be held. These defects in the state of ordinary elementary instruction, the desire to extend the introduction of manual work into ordinary elementary schools and to encourage higher elementary and trade instruction, com bined with political and social considerations into which it is no part of our duty to enter here, have led to the enactment of the law of December 11, 1880, on handicraft apprenticeship schools, and of the law of June 11, 1881, on gratuitous primary instruction, and to the introduction of the projet de loi on compulsory primary instruction, which is still before the chambers.
