

IMMORTALITY A WORLD-WIDE BELIEF. From the worlds earliest morning the thought of man linked life to a longer chain of time than that between the cradle and the grave. We find everywhere what Emerson calls mans audacious belief in a future life. In the minds of all men, or wherever man appears, says the sage of Concord, this belief appears with him, "in the savage, savagely ; in the pure, purely. John Fiske, in Myths and Myth Makers, says : The Idea of Death is something impossible for the primitive mind to entertain. Among the primitive people, like the Egyptians, the doctrine of immortality was not a mere hypothesis ; it was as Schlegel was forced to admit, a lively certainty, like the feelings of ones own being. And, if according to Carlyle, living in the hope of immortality is derived from the nobility of man, then must the old tenants of Egypt have been a noble race. That the future life is but a shadow of the present, is the idea that runs through Homer, who lived about nine hundred years before Christ. What noble and elevated conceptions of life in the spirit world Socrates gives us five hundred years before Christ. What an argument in Platos Phaedon to demonstrate the immortality "the profoundest reason ever produced. That man lived on somehow or other, were it only in the melancholy shadow of existence, was the general idea ever since there was a Greek people. ...
