

The Desis, immigrants from the Indian subcontinent, are under attack. The powerful Senator Neverist travels across America, accusing the Desis of being un-American just because their wedding ceremonies involve horses, elephants and drums at midnight. "We must banish Desi rituals in America. None of that synchronized dancing, no confusing dance-offs™s and no high-pitched singing." Thanks to the senator's relentless campaign, Desis are now booed in the streets. Hate mail arrives in Desi homes delivered by postmen who also hate them but continue to deliver the mail because it is hateful. And now senator Neverist is proposing a new government agency called W.T.A (Watch Them Always) to monitor the lives of all Desis in America. This is unacceptable to Adnan Raheem Khan, a man of great mental beauty, who lives in Dallas, Texas with two extremely happy children and an angry wife. Determined to live a life of higher purpose (one that does not involve rebooting computers all day), Adnan quits his job and declares himself "president" of his own political party "the Desi League. Bills are pending. His wife is furious. The Desi League includes Mr. Maaf Karna, an extremely polite man who begins every sentence with "forgive me," Mr. Hisaab Khan, an angry professor and author of Mathematical Reasons to Love Math and Minhaj, the naive wide eyed narrator of the novel, who after watching too much Baywatch came to America to become a life guard. Can Adnan Raheem Khan and the squabbling Desi League stand up to a hostile media, angry voters, a powerful senator, and Adnan's disapproving wife?
