

“Listen to me”™ is an autobiography of a child all through his school life. It is different from all the other boring autobiographies in terms that it encompasses teenage life and is written by a teenager himself. I have tried to cover every aspect of life as if it was my doctoral dissertation. The story shows how a new student found his way into the fame of the school campus, how he lost his way into the student underworld and how he still managed to win the hearts of almost everyone in the school. The book is built on peccadilloes we usually overlook in our lives but enjoy when we experience it. In the book, I have shown myself juggling my grades, trying to make my way into student gangs, hustling my way to the top tier of the student body and finally facing the poignant dilemma of college. The plot is simple, but it is the sub stories that are worth my time spent in this book. Be it the story of your first stage performance, your first fight in school, your first prank, your first crush on a senior student or your first experience of the hormone gush during puberty. And though the story floats on a light tone, it doesn’t fail to raise serious theories about life, concerns about the burden of education and mind state of the young adults. In all honesty, though the book is all about me and my life, it wouldn’t fail to relate with yours. The plot is simple but very twisted and thickened. It urges its readers to delve in deeper and provokes their actions. It’s much more than a book, it’s an entity bound in pages. The book’s plot is not wholly autobiographical, and so the characters not fully disclosed. The spot-light is only on the protagonist, his choices and dilemma, and his life experiences. The characters are not as important in this story as the central character. The plot is studded with diamonds of comedy, rubies of adventure, emerald of drama that makes it the perfect young-adult novel. It wouldn’t quite qualify as a non-fiction because it is more bent on giving the readers a story rather than just tales of life.
