

The Mid-West Quarterly for April, 1914, October, 1913, January, 1914, and July, 1915, respectively; the fifth and sixth in University Studies (Nebraska) for October, 1913, and July-October, 1919. The seventh and eighth have never been published before. The notion of using Goethe's phrase, the illusion of a higher reality, as a kind of canon or test of literature an idea that I have worked out after a fashion in the last two essays occurred to me first in a paper on Maupassant which was written for the New York Evening Post and was afterwards included in my Literary Reviews and Criticisms (1908). Logically, the paper entitled Corneille: the Neo-Classical Tragedy and the Greek, which appears in the Reviews and Criticisms, should stand in this volume between Greek Tragedy and Racine; but at the publication of the earlier volume the thought of such a series had not come into my mind.
